The influence of inorganic phosphorus and inorganic nitrogen concentrations on the anaerobic oxidation of methane, and on the anaerobic biodegradation of ethane and benzene were investigated under a variety of conditions. At varying levels of inorganic nitrogen and phosphorus, methane was oxidized to carbon dioxide with relative rates that were proportional to the electron acceptor concentration. Methane oxidation was not inhibited by inorganic nitrogen, yet at high methane concentrations benzene and ethane degradation were inhibited. Ethane degradation was inhibited at high concentrations of inorganic phosphorus. Underlying a number of other experiments was the finding that, in contrast to methane, benzene did not oxidize to CO₂ when treated with ammonium but did when treated with hydrogen. Mechanisms of these observations are discussed.

A single-model approach of emerging infectious diseases in animal health - Improving all systems: 'One Health' approach. The number of emerging infectious diseases (EIDs) is growing steadily, indicating that EIDs are a global public health threat. Many have already occurred on our planet, and we are observing the emergence of several new strains of pathogens associated with human and animal disease every year. Our inability to predict, prevent, or control the spread of EIDs has been due to a lack of knowledge of the drivers and pathways involved in these epidemics. This situation indicates that, without implementing the 'One Health' approach, the success of any preventive or control strategy will be limited. The 'One Health' approach is a paradigm shift towards the integration of animal and human health care systems through recognition and collaboration between multidisciplinary, diverse professionals working across boundaries of species and disciplines. Because of the increasing complexity of disease control, the overall implementation of the One Health approach should be considered a high priority to improve the prevention, detection, and response to EIDs and also to maintain and improve the animal health status of livestock and the human health status of the population. The following seven steps should be considered to implement the One Health approach: (1) need identification; (2) disaster identification; (3) preparedness, including biosafety; (4) response, including diagnostics and surveillance; (5
